Large Birds Theme

With close to a million different birds, humans have had the privilege of observing this feathered tribe at close range. They can be seen every where - eating the flesh of their own kind in a gaggle of a dozen or more, congregating in huge flocks, strutting and squabbling with one another, and migrating thousands of miles in search of a better climate. But despite the daily show of their opulence, much of what we know about the bird kingdom comes from the writings of naturalists who came before us and took the time to carefully study them. Early twentieth century ornithologists documented and catalogued all the bird species they could find, not only their physical attributes, but their fascinating behavioral tendencies and what they meant to the bird's ecosystem. In their desire to understand the birds, they gave us the clues we need to know who they are and where they come from. And our enjoyment of the birds is not limited to the beauty of their plumage and their vocal charms. I believe we should treat the birds with the same respect we give our fellow human inhabitants, and as a result, we tend to think of them as a highly interesting and at times a highly respected species. In this collection of high quality Birds photos, I have tried to illustrate the magnificence of these gorgeous creatures. I have also tried to present them with their usual ease, as if I am just another naturalist - sharing with the viewer a window into the natural world, viewed through the eyes of an ornithologist. Enjoy. News Russian Government Declares Plastic Bacteria as Public Enemy February 4th, 2015 Russia is now the second country after the USA to announce that they have proven evidence of one of the most dangerous and most commonly occurring, veritable scourge of humanity— the poisonous scourge of plastic. Companies, such as Nestle, McDonald's and Coca-Cola, that know such attacks are coming are pleased with this new information. Bacteria in trace amounts that can't be detected by any standard testing are beginning to cause widespread illnesses. These complaints are being lodged by an increasing number of people in the US, Europe, Australia, and of course, Russia— where they've learned of this new level of truth via local news. Other major companies, including Toyota and Nike, are not willing to admit to possible contamination, fearing a loss of public confidence in their products. A recent Infowars 09e8f5149f
