A: var exec = require('child_process').exec; exec('keygen', ['install']); The Future of Mature Markets: New Capital, New Firms, New Rules As the equity markets shake off a difficult year, 2011 is poised to be a record year for deal making. The years ahead might see the reshuffling of dynamics and attention in the market. The last decade has seen "there is no market" rules. The "Valuation 101" that marketers and Wall Street have tried to parrot for decades has been the mantra for the post-bubble era. The results, however, have been the opposite of what was intended. The result of this era was that the major U.S. equity deals have been either done through private placements or through IPOs. With the liquidity we have seen, the main purpose of either has been to fund acquisition. We saw deals such as Altera, AppDynamics, Avaya, BMC, Ciena, Cognizant, Comcast, EMC, HPE, Mapquest, Nagra, Nutanix and Yahoo! all being funded by private equity deals in 2011. The biggest deals of the year have largely been in the IPOs market, with Magna International, Motorola Solutions, NXP and Whirlpool all done in 2011. And although the public markets saw a surge in share sell-offs, there were only two IPOs — Blackstone and Clearwire — in the last year. Of course, there has always been balance. Along with the private equity and the IPO market, there has been a growing and noisy "alternative" model of financing. These are growth companies being financed by equity, venture capital, private debt, fund equity, private equity and so on. Within that model is also a post-money valuation model of the company where the dollars raised determine the future equity. If you raise $100 million and the company's share price is $50 million, then you are undervalued at 50%. This 3da54e8ca3
