Q: The lingua franca (or part of the lingua franca) of linguistics Recently I have heard the phrase "The lingua franca of linguistics" being used several times (in books, and theses). What does it mean? I am not asking for a definition. I'm just curious what linguistic groups such as scholars from South America, Asia, Eastern Europe, Africa and so on, use most frequently. A: The common term for the "common language" of a community of scholars is a "lingua franca". This is a phrase that comes from the real world: Italian is a lingua franca among many cultures, especially in East Africa. It basically means "common language" (of some sort). So, we can apply this to Linguistics as well. If we say that there are major lingua franca in the Linguistics community, they would be: English Russian German French Spanish Italian (to name a few) But there are also many minor ones

(as well as academic languages that are often used to communicate within certain groups of scholars) Japanese Portuguese Chinese (Mandarin) Swahili Somali As this is rather objective and not "political", we can use it to talk about the linguistics of regions as well (although we'd have to be careful in some places, such as Latin America).
