To evaluate, with a standardized instrument, anorexia-bulimia as an eating disorder. The Eating Disorder Inventory (EDI) was administered to 30 women with the DSM-III-R diagnosis of anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa, 30 women with an eating disorder not otherwise specified, and 30 healthy women as a control group. There were significant differences in the Body Dissatisfaction sub-scale and, partially, in the Weight Concern, Impulsivity, Ineffectiveness, Interpersonal Distrust and Tolerance sub-scales of the EDI between the three eating disorder groups and controls. The Binge-Eating sub-scale of the EDI discriminated the anorexia and bulimia groups from the other two eating disorder groups, and the Overvaluation of Appearance sub-scale correlated significantly with BMI and total body weight in all three groups of eating disorders. This study shows that anorexia and bulimia are distinct eating disorders, with different patterns of personality traits and body image perceptions, that can be identified using psychometric tools.The existing forms and methods for visually
