Firmware Update. Identix Accuvid USB ADR800 Eyewear Kit - This invention relates to a mechanism for positioning and moving a packer on a well. Typically, casing will be run in the well and a wellhead will be attached to the top of the casing. A packer is attached below the casing, and extends into the well so that fluid pressures in the casing may be equalized. When the well has been drilled and cased, drilling fluid must be circulated through the well to remove the drill bit and to cool and lubricate the bit while drilling. The fluid includes grease, and if this grease mixes with the drilling fluid, the temperature will greatly increase. The grease can then be carried into the casing and possibly into the annular space between the casing and the wellhead. This will cause the casing to seize or stick in the wellhead, making it difficult or impossible to remove the casing and the wellhead. The packer is used to isolate the annular space for a period of time after the well is drilled and cased. The packer is designed to seal off the annular space from the well bore. Several types of packers are used in wells, including elastomeric packers, spring-loaded packers and metallic packers. When these packers are set, the well has to be reopened and the packer retrieved from the well. Typically, this will be done by using a whipstock to cut the casing and clean the well bore ahead of the packer and using a frac plug to
