The game is a voxel-based world builder where you create your own infinite worlds. Microcosm has a simple, yet rich visual style, and the whole game is interactive. Create worlds by placing, deleting, and modifying voxels. Aim, move, delete, and paint existing voxels. Save your creations as .cosm files, then share them with other people! The game supports swappable voxel-based editors, including: An adaptive grid editor with automatic paths. A perspective editor (for customizing the desktop camera). A box selection editor (see the demo video). A particle editor with a lighting system (optional). The game has built-in world sharing (see the How To section). Microcosm was originally written in Objective-C, but I've recently rewritten the entire engine and voxel editor in C++/Lua, with the intent to provide far more performance than before. The game can be played in a desktop window, or in "VR" mode in the Vive and Oculus platforms. Using a Vive and Touch controllers, the voxels and camera controls are mapped to real-world input: `left click` deletes voxels, `right click` selects voxels, and `touch or press and drag` edits the selection. The game currently runs on Mac and Windows systems. Microcosm is now also available on iOS, with voxel art made by Dan O'Rourke. And if you'd like to create or edit your own visual art assets, I have included all of the original art and textures. The art for Microcosm is all made with voxel art software, microVoxel, and is available on my website as well as on the Mac app store. The voxel export plug-in for Microcosm (`microcosm-ply`) has been merged into PlyGram voxel editor. To see everything you can do with PlyGram, including what you can do with the OBJ export plug-in (`microcosm-

Around the World in 80 Flights is a FSX: Steam Edition single player simulator flight-sim created using the Rhino Game Engine. The primary objective of the game is to circumnavigate the globe in an aircraft of your choice. The game begins with the player taking off from Farnborough Airfield in the UK in a 1927 Lockheed Electra aircraft. The first leg of the journey is to America. You will fly a total of 75,000 km, covering 112 different countries as you travel around the world. Along the way you will encounter many interesting landmarks and buildings. The route from Farnborough to Fairbanks takes you through North Wales and Scotland before the challenge of the Himalayas. These mountains come right into the middle of the route on the final leg to America. In the final leg you will fly across the Bering Sea to Alaska and then on to America. The journey will culminate with a landing at Los Angeles. The game has a total of 80 flying missions. You can fly them in whichever order you want or you can simply fly them sequentially. This game has the capability of including your own narrative as to what you do on the trip and your decisions that you make. The game has been coded and optimized for Virtual Reality (VR). You can fly in VR and look around the cockpit. The virtual cockpit works very well with the audio alone and can create a real sense of flying across the world. The VR version is supported by the Steam VR device. Flight Visuals:- Own Built Systems: The airframe of the Electra is based on the standard design of the Lockheed 10A Electra. Many of the systems built into the Electra airframe are also used in the aircraft in this game. The primary flight controls come from the Cockpit trainer of the late 1920s. Because of the short flight time of the Electra, it cannot sustain a single engine. It relies on the additional power of the two twin R-2750-S2614 engines. It is interesting to note that the standard R-2750 engine produces 18,000 lbs of thrust. The R-2750s in this game produce an estimated 42,500 lbs of thrust each. This power is split into two engines. The game does add a disclaimer stating that the engine power is not realistic. The copy of the R-2750 engines in the game are not highly detailed, rather, they are used to illustrate the flight mechanics of the game. The main airframe used in the game is the Lockheed 10E2

What's new:

By Bob Ellis Surely it's this, that some sort of natural selection have happened. Some of us tried to be pleasant, but that doesn't work. Some of us tried to be so discreet that no one would ever notice and that didn't work. Now we're all sort of staring each other in the face, and we can't help letting the boredom out, because we know that it will bother other people if we don't [From Games of Position: a science fair winner, 1915, ed. Gayle Johnson and John D. Jones, Chicago: Science Service, 1980, p. 37, PDF here.] To laugh at the normal joke is to fall so far behind the curve of modern humor that you become plain tedious. (Not entirely, of course.) I would recommend a good family-psychological study, with study groups of idiots. As I understand it now, the idea is that there is no such thing as human mind-sense-knowing, but that the idiot can feel, know, remember, think, make certain judgments, and ultimately say "I know." The wonderful thing is that the idiot knows it without trouble. Invent a category for that one to fit it out. I would recommend a thorough study of the manner in which people will talk to total strangers, and who's talking to whom. I would recommend that you begin to examine the early years of your own life, and what happened that made difference. I think it always happens, and I don't think it's that serious. Charles Mingus said something like that. It meant something like "There is nothing which I can do for you, once you've finished with me." The most boring life can happen. A family is posted at the end of the street on quiet Sunday mornings. When one is sad, chocolate is offered. When one is happy, cheese is offered. Paul Blume told a story about a guy named Mark Jones who expired. He consumed two of his own children and a few members of his family. So when he died, his spirit flew up into the moon, where it met

Did you notice the string of cranes that stood by, as workers at 1 WTC bagged abandoned construction material? No, you haven't missed much. Police detained a man who tried to weld a bicycle chain to the rails to span the gaping chasm. But the MTA is already promising work to begin by Sunday — apart from the toll to be paid in human lives. A cracked rail in July could have let serious damage inside the tunnels — though preliminary findings appear to indicate it was caused by something that might have been less than catastrophic. In a panic of its own, the MTA called out the corps of engineers and safety commissioners from the N.Y.P.D. and the transit police. After an early-morning MTA inspection, the safety commissioners found no integrity problems. That means the crack in the subway, which can be seen easily on Google Street View, showed no
