The authors describe a patient with the antiphospholipid syndrome (APS) and recurrent portal vein thromboses (PVT) associated with both venous and arterial thromboses. The underlying hypercoagulable state was further supported by alterations in the coagulation and fibrinolysis system that included the activation of the fibrinolytic system and the inhibition of plasminogen activator activity. We conclude that in patients with non-cirrhotic portal hypertension and recurrent PVT, a systemic hypercoagulable state should be considered in the absence of infections or other etiologies. Additional studies will provide more information on the role of thrombophilia in PVT., whereas areas located closer to the wrist joint or immobilization should induce an earlier response. A study on squeezing hand was carried out. Hence, activity in the primary motor cortex was estimated by transcranial magnetic stimulation. The stimulation was taken over the hand area of contralateral primary motor cortex in the right side. This affected the movement of the right hand. Hence, the effect of exercise on the individual will be first observable in the right side of the arm. The motor cortex is directly stimulated. Hence, this approach is simple, non-invasive and easy to use in clinical diagnosis. Distraction A study was done to examine the effect of distraction on slow-twitch muscles. Distraction was used to provide distraction, which is assumed to slow down the contraction velocity. Monopolar or bipolar Many treatments use bipotential TENS to aid in muscular rehabilitation. It is mainly done by stimulation of the motor nerve fibers by the implant of a TENS unit. The surgery is a procedure, which involves the stripping of a strip of skin from the patient's arm and using it to connect an implant which would later be applied on the skin. The implant comprises two prongs of electrodes, which are required for the attachment of two wires, one for cathodal and the other for an
