What's new:

Our nation was built out of a struggle for Enlightenment ideals that sought to establish a new basis for community grounded in the dignity, rights and freedom of all people. In Europe and in the United States, ideas that denied the dignity of some human beings led directly and inevitably to bloody, destructive results, and those ideas continue to impair our ability to relate meaningfully to one another. Racism, ethnocentrism, misogyny, and animus against any identifiable group of people are all enemies of the Enlightenment and the values that flow from it. Organizations of anti-Enlightenment ideology are now globally active. These organizations are based on the premise that some groups of people must be dehumanized, oppressed, and controlled. They seek to deny free speech to certain groups, including Muslim groups. Efforts to combat or marginalize the works, organizations, and individual contributions of certain groups are prominently featured in this recent anti-Enlightenment mythology. In Europe, for example, the Gutmensch movement seeks to condemn certain words and viewpoints as hateful. In the United States, efforts are being made to deny tax incentives to research institutions that study and promote equality, especially discrimination against women. The basis of this new anti-Enlightenment ideology is identity-based tribalism. Competition is not about defeating the other; it is about defining who is in and who is out. Self-determination and self-defense are no longer basic values to be honored. Rather, self-determination and self-defense are conditions that must be acknowledged or negotiated. We need to understand two things. First, if we continue to celebrate the Enlightenment, we are no less willing to fight the enemies of freedom, of fairness, of equality, and of self-determination than we were centuries ago. Second, given the new enemy, and the defeat of the old enemies, we can renew the commitment to a better society. Enlightenment Hubris
