It's free and it will always be. to a column in the Assorted Benchmarks Database. The title of the article is "Bayesian inference and digital images" and the abstract of the paper reads "The Bayesian framework has been recently applied to deal with visual perception in the area of image retrieval and digital image segmentation. In this paper we present a thorough analysis of the main classification schemes and apply them to an artificial digital image dataset. This study provides a benchmark for the Bayesian modeling of visual perception by a cognitive agent, and it is organized into three parts. First, we evaluate three different classification schemes: the Subspace Discriminant (SD) scheme, the Hierarchical Bayes classifier (HBC), and the Support Vector Machine (SVM). These three schemes are then applied to the data set used for the implementation of the three tasks. We evaluate the results with standard precision and recall measures. The three schemes have clearly shown their weaknesses in classifying the data set and, although the SVM scheme has shown the best results in the retrieval task, Bayesian approaches have to be encouraged since they substantially improve the classification scheme. A preliminary analysis of the most common Bayesian approaches for digital images is also presented. In conclusion, we can state that Bayesian approaches do have their advantages in dealing with image data, but have to be further explored. To allow for an ease of comparison, we chose to provide our online database of images here in the form of many JPEGs rather than to arrange the database at a web page. We have taken such a decision to allow the optimization of the training of the HDMB database by the community of VEID researchers.
