Have we learned anything? That while it can be useful to your career to be seen as "whipable," it might also hurt you. That others would rather see you as a champion than a whipping boy. And one thing is clear: some people are much more flexible than others. You see, I have found that using a whip brings nothing but pain to the person being whipped. They are too psychologically invested in the whip and even though they know it is an unpleasant experience, they cling to it, and often ask if they can use it on you next. Even if they let you go, your back is still sore, and it can be dangerous to fight with a whip. And yes, whipping blows are not meant to hurt, but they do. They are not corrective, they are intended for the violent. The person who stands to gain the most from that kind of therapy is the person who applies it to himself. He gains what he never had in life. Namely, the ability to control his own life, to lead himself. And this comes with responsibility. Yes, you are responsible for your own actions, and for your own state of being. But it is also your responsibility to take care of yourself. Because how you treat yourself will often be reflected in how others treat you. You choose your success in life. Why People Whip Other People One of the reasons why people whip themselves is because they feel that they lack power in their life. In fact, they feel like they have little or no control over how they exist. They desperately need to feel like they have a grip on their life. But why would someone whip another human being? It simply doesn't make sense. It may be that it is unconscious. But the truth is that it is usually because of a one way relationship. That they have a feeling of a limited power balance, and feel threatened. And when you get whipped, you don't have to worry about what they have power over, you
