Another waterjet cutting process may be used to form various shapes or to make holes into the materials. These cutting processes involve a high-pressure water flow that generates fast-moving jets of water, which can be used to cut different materials such as metals or plastics. The waterjet cutter is very versatile and can be used for a variety of applications, and can even be used to make holes in wood or other non-metallic materials. With the help of the Waterjet Cutter for Dummies, you can cut both metals and non-metals, as well as wood, textiles, leather, rubber and many more. In order to perform a cut, there are no pre-existing cuts and the cutting process begins as soon as the two water streams meet. The cutter uses a forward-motion and the main cutting direction is at 45 degrees from the axis, which is the typical waterjet cutting direction. Simple features to use If this is the first time you're using a waterjet cutting machine, it can be hard to understand what the
