Morphology of bipolar cells in the optic tectum of the guinea pig: the type I and type II cells. Bipolar cells in the tectum of adult guinea pigs were examined using serial sections stained with toluidine blue. The cells were classified according to their somatic morphology, dendritic branching patterns, and synaptic distribution. There was no separation of cell types in the superficial tectal laminae. In the superficial laminae, the main cell types (a1-e) were multipolar cells with dendrites radiating in all directions. Their dendritic tree was composed of two groups of dendrites: 1) a short vertical and 2) a longer horizontal branching pattern. Most bipolar cells were multipolar cells whose branching dendrites took a vertical course in the superficial layers. The immunohistochemical results in the superficial laminae demonstrate the presence of four different types of axon terminals immunoreactive to the antiserum against GABA. These types correspond to the cell types a1-e. However, the terminal distribution of type c and type d bipolar cells was found to be less well defined than that of cells of types a and b, as well as that of the other three types. The results of our study indicate the lack of a specific polarity for one cell type.

Chapter 09 Dr. Mallard Dr. Mallard was the town doctor, a tall, steely-looking black man of about fifty with a hard face. He had been in town twenty-five years. He wasn't well liked by the town people, but by the town women, who loved him. Also, he had a whiskey-colored eye, one that looked malicious. Jack opened the door for him and when he was inside, Dr. Mallard put his hat and coat on the hall rack and sat down on the edge of the recliner. "Your wife all right?" he asked. "Who, Louise?" "Yeah, Louise." "Sure. She's fine." Dr. Mallard stared at him critically. "Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!" he said. "What?" said Jack. "MRS. NELSON HAD A GUTTER! What kind of people are you all?" Jack felt his face grow warm. "We're husband and wife, Dr. Mallard," he said. "Well
