Money and views: what unites the mainstream media and populism? At risk of indulging in sociology, we can't help but wonder whether today's mainstream media is slowly turning into the autonomous political body that the late Tony Hall described so vividly in 2010: "In the premiership, it is not his political opponent that the media decide to support, as he might expect. Rather, it is the ones who appear to present a simple challenge to the right of the political class, its agenda and its supporters. Although their natural competition is the left, the new 'politically correct' media effectively present themselves as a 'left-right' alternative" (Tony Hall, 'The death of political reporting', Civil Service World, 2010). If today's mainstream media is indeed increasingly aligned to the right of politics, what are the main reasons for it? There is of course the existence of a structural shift towards the right that has taken place over the last half century, as Benjamin Harkness has documented ('How conservatives built the media universe', The American Interest, 2016). However, some explanation has to be found if it is to make sense to be discussing the media's role in underpinning a populist, reaction-based politics. The solution may lie in the peculiarities of the system in which the mainstream media functions. As media studies has long recognised, there is a 'frame' in which media organisations work, what might be called a pragmatic frame. The media is not only considered to be trustworthy and impartial, but also willing to be objective (for more on the reasons for this, see 'Trust in media, facts and information', Journalism Practice, 2017). Through this frame, media organisations are expected to be able to satisfy their users' needs. Their funding, which is also public money, is therefore conditioned on the extent to which they are perceived as doing this. As Michael Stuchtey has argued, the news agenda is typically set by media organisations, as they believe that they, the public and particularly the government, need them to act as a guarantor of truth and independence. As John Lloyd has put it, the media becomes 'intermediaries of government' ("Going-for-Gold": the political values of newspapers', press regulator and think tank 'Re: Public', 2016
