Content analysis of electronic cigarettes across the United States: first results. Electronic cigarettes (e-cigs) are tobacco-free devices that deliver nicotine, flavorants, and other chemicals through a battery-powered vaporizer that heats and atomizes a solution containing water, propylene glycol, glycerin, nicotine, and flavorants. E-cig marketing claims that they are less harmful than conventional cigarettes, support smoking cessation, and are reduced-risk alternatives.

However, many of these claims lack empirical support. Our objective was to evaluate what information is available for e-cigs in the public domain and to address the validity of many of the marketing claims. We analyzed e-cig information in popular websites of major e-cig manufacturers and retail stores by using Google and Bing search engines and Microsoft Azure Cognitive Services (Cambridge, MA). We found that e-cigs are popular among youth (most youth 18 years and younger are interested in e-cigs), that they are marketed as reduced-risk alternatives (many websites claim that e-cigs are less harmful than conventional cigarettes), that e-cigs have benefits for smokers, and that using e-cigs could help smokers to quit conventional cigarettes. However, many websites that make these claims are not trustworthy and could potentially deceive the public. E-cigs are marketed as reduced-risk alternatives that could help smokers to quit conventional cigarettes. Some e-cig websites claim that e-cigs are less harmful than conventional cigarettes. Many e-cig websites are not trustworthy and, thus, could deceive the public about the risks of using e-cigs. To promote the health of people, third-party cert
