Now, a new window will open and you can follow the instruction to connect your device. If you want to review the USB device drivers for your system and check for updates, go to Device Manager. Select View and choose Details in the context menu. Right-click the device and select Update Driver. If the hard disk is not being recognized by your computer, make sure that you have the correct driver for your model. If you still have problems with the USB drive or other USB device, try the following:

Driver ACASIS FA05US USB Device For Windows 10 64bit

The problem with USB3.1 is that its aim is to be the universal external interface for all devices, including network interfaces, audio interfaces, and what have you.

USB3.1 Type-C is to do just that, not just peripherals, but the main bus too. This will likely mean that USB3.1 Type-C peripherals are likely to be expensive, but that is an issue for another day. I was not going to review this, as the quality of ports on the dock isnt great, but its taken half a days worth of work to figure out that the USB Type-C connector and ACASIS docking station are not set to the same voltage, and so are incompatible. I am aware of the issues of the dock because its review copy, not the one you would find in the wild.

Fortunately this is a simple fix, though to achieve it you need to use a USB to USB

Type-C cable, which you cant buy in Australia, so a trip to the US might be in order. Although obviously you could do it the old fashioned way, just swap out the dock for a USB3.1 Type-C hub. I have not achieved this fix on my own yet, as I have not been able to get a Type-C cable (and even if I did I could not find a USB3.1 hub) to work with an ACASIS. The image below shows the simple "Swap for Type-C cable" fix that could be made to the ACASIS.

Actually swapping the connections will most likely require disassembling the dock as well, and probably may take a power tool or two to achieve. The Nutanix team is dedicated to helping customers to find the optimal solution for their business needs.
