Metrics like test coverage, defects found, and line coverage are useful to understand the quality of the code. Unfortunately, we often end up with reports with more noise than insights, such as ["Test coverage for this module is 85.6%,"]{} ["We have 80% of functional tests passing,"]{} and ["Only 95% of lines are covered by tests,"]{} which are good indicators, but only if they are interpreted properly. Continuous integration frameworks like Travis allow for collecting quantitative data about the quality of the code. However, as with other metrics, these reports usually end up with more noise than insight. Data-Driven Programming ----- This is the typical scenario that developers are familiar with. In most projects, developers are responsible for the maintenance and improvement of their code. Developers can start by noticing that a component is not being used anywhere, or that a feature is poorly implemented. Depending on their skill, developers can extract information from the code and create more advanced metrics that allow them to determine the health of their application, and identify the source of the problems. As a developer, I've had the pleasure of being one of the first people to use a project. Even though the project is in its early stages, I've been able to identify the types of bugs that have been introduced and have come up with the solution to the problems. This experience has taught me that we should not only rely on statistical reports that could report false positives, but also data-driven analysis that can find the real source of the problem and the root cause. Case study {#sec:case-study} ===== Every codebase has good and bad code. The goal of our continuous integration system is to identify when a pull request (PR) fails and not only warn developers when there is a problem, but also identify the root cause of the problem. To achieve this, we would like to have a better understanding of the project. \ Travis
