Software reviews that are so time-consuming going to be out of date! No longer need a long video to watch in order to satisfy? No longer need to listen to a difficult to understand description of the software to be sure. I also find it odd that Adobe keeps referring to Lightroom as a RAW converter when it is, in fact, a RAW editor. The subject is often brought up during Lightroom reviews on MediaPortal and other sites. The main problem with implementing such a program is that it cannot change file types. Lightroom cannot change a file from RAW to JPEG, take a JPEG and convert it back to DNG, and so on. Of course, during development, new files can be created or modified, and Lightroom can save those changes non-destructively. However, if I import a RAW file and make some changes into it, then I am forced to save the results as a JPEG or TIFF file in order to resize them before attaching them to a relative or a free-form capsule. In the end, all new images have to undergo a process of record-keeping. They consume disk space as a DNG file and they are saved time-stamped in a folder. All of that will ultimately eat up system resources if you have lots of RAW files to manage.
