Photoshop has a layer mask feature on all layers by default. This is a layer mask that is based on the current layer color. To create a layer mask, you just need to select the layer and click Layer > New Layer Mask. You can't really delete layers in Photoshop, but you can talk to Photoshop like a virtual layer compactor. To do that, go to the Layer dropdown and choose Smart Objects > Layer Comps (shift-click) then choose Convert to Smart Object. Now, you can turn off this layer if you need to. All you have to do is use a layer's shortcut key, F1, to turn off the layer. It's like a layer finder and a trash can all wrapped into one. Anything in Photoshop has the capability of being shaded. There's a really handy way to add a simple highlight using filters. You can create a huge variety of filter styles in case you need to create a graduated lighting effect. Your previous work can be imported with great ease, via touch screen capability, into Photoshop and the magic of layer transforms and recombine can be used. Modern workflows are an important part of all designers' today, and Photoshop is a very flexible tool that almost any designer can use. With the release of newer versions they can enhance workflow even more. When experimenting, try to keep the least amount of time possible in Photoshop so you don't end up with redundant work. There's just no reason why Photoshop shouldn't be part of every designers toolkit today.
