BRAZEN Description: This program can be used to snap a picture of a window, the entire screen or a set of windows. If you don't know which part of the screen you want to capture, you can also type a rectangle in the box. The program comes with a built-in file explorer so you can access and save your picture. However, you can always add a custom path and browse for your files directly from the program. Another useful feature is the possibility to mark the desired window. This will make it easier to select only the window you want to capture and not all windows on the screen. You can also select text that should be captured and enter a description. DownloadQ: In a synch var is it better to copy the value or make a reference to the variable? If I create a variable in a javascript function such as: function foo() { var x = 20; var x2 = x; } Is it better to make a reference using the var keyword or to create a new variable with the same value? x is going to be updated in a very large function so copying it and storing it in the function in a variable is taking up a lot of space. But assigning it to the var keyword is also taking up memory. I was wondering if it is better to just copy the value like: function foo() { var x = 20; } Then change x every time I want to update the value of x. A: A copy is probably the best way to go. If your update logic is in a very large function, then you might be able to just create a global variable, and put your logic in the constructor of your large function. var foo = new
